18th Century French Carved Walnut Armoire with Paneled Doors and Bun Feet

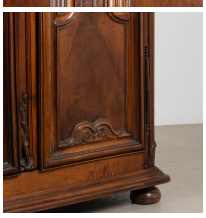

Impressive 18th century French armoire crafted in walnut, featuring beautifully carved paneled doors and a stately architectural presence. The natural walnut finish highlights the rich wood grain, while elaborate decorative carving across the doors and crown reflects the craftsmanship of traditional French furniture.

The tall cabinet rests on substantial bun feet and is fitted with six large French hinges, adding to its impressive scale and character. Paneled construction continues along the sides, providing additional architectural detail.

The right door opens using an elaborate old lock and functioning key. The key must be turned completely to the right to release the locking mechanism. When closed, the right door does not sit entirely flush, although this is not noticeable when viewing the armoire directly from the front.

The interior offers three shelves, two of which are newer construction. The older central section includes three drawers, with simple iron hanging pulls on two drawers. The far-left drawer does not have a pull.

The left door is secured by an elaborate old locking system. To release it, a metal knob located beneath the central shelf must be pressed downward, disengaging both the upper and lower locking mechanisms.

More than two centuries of use are reflected in the aged walnut surface. Cracks are visible along the upper portions of both sides, with additional cracking, distress, and old dried wormholes around the carved details and other areas. The wormhole activity is no longer active, and these signs of age do not impact function.

A slight gap is visible between the crown and the right side, and minor old repairs can be seen throughout. This large, substantial armoire was constructed in sections to facilitate transportation and installation.

Restored, stable, and ready to use. A striking example of 18th century French craftsmanship, combining rich walnut grain, decorative carving, and generous enclosed storage.
